The Colossae Project

The Bronze Age site of ancient Colossae in southern Turkey is important for scholars of the Bible and still awaits archaeological interpretation. Australian links to this site have grown over the past decade, through the initiative of researchers from Flinders University school of theology and department of archaeology, Michael Trainor, Claire Smith and Alan Cadwallader. They have built collegial relationships between Australians and Turks, Christians and Muslims, and with Turkish civic and academic leaders who are also interested in the site's interpretation. They have built up networks of friendship through their travels to Turkey. Their research in some of the world's leading libraries has allowed them to catalogue how Colossae was interpreted and regarded over the centuries by visitors, archaeologists and warriors.

The September Adelaide Conference on Colossae is the first national conference on this ancient site. But it has implications for the way scholars and researchers interpret archaeological sites, and allow this interpretation to occur in a context of dialogue with those who have other research skills and interests, especially from a biblical context.

‘Gaining historical information about Colossae is hampered by the fact that the site has never been excavated’
Margaret MacDonald
