Abstract

Journeying and journalling, pathways and words. Pathways are no longer necessarily well-defined, well-ordered. Sentences may no longer be understood, necessarily, as lines; both can be constructed out of chunks, there may be dis/located images, places and times where movement is not possible, places and times where sentences flow, to fill spaces, places where time becomes memory becomes the un/known, becomes a re-sensing and a re-storying. Using one specific journey through several layers of human and geological space and time, this paper will explore words, language and structure as a dis/location of the internalised nature of space/time.
